During the Industrial Revolution in Europe, everyone was so taken up with the wonder of machines turning out goods in huge quantities that no thought was spared for the poor workers. The factory-owner was concerned only with his profit. Workers were very poorly paid and had to work long hours. They lived in a state of shocking poverty and thousands died an early death. Later, things began to improve, and in all advanced countries, there were new laws protecting workers right. It has also been realized that a man who is contented does much more work than a man who is not. So, if a worker is given good wages and is treated fairly, it benefits the employer in the long run.

Our Government also is taking special care to see that the living and working condition of our workers are good and they get a fair deal. We have many laws protecting their rights. One deals with minimum wages, others help them in case of sickness or injury. Factories are inspected to see the working conditions of workers are good. New houses for workers are also being built.

- i. What is the effect of Industrial Revolution in Europe?
- ii. How were the factory-workers treated first?
- iii. What is the attitude of factory owners towards workers now?
- iv. What benefits the employer?
- v. What steps are being taken by our Government to protect the rights of workers and improve their condition?
